At present, the standard treatment for hepatocellular carcinoma (HCC) is hepatectomy, but this surgery cannot cure all HCCs. It has been considered that chemotherapy for HCC reduces the recurrence of the disease after surgical resection, as has been shown for other tumour types. We conducted a randomized controlled trial of preoperative radiotherapy in patients with HCC and compared the results with a group of patients who had surgery alone. The study was completed in April 2000, and the primary outcome measure, overall survival, was recently reported in the Lancet. Because of the effects of the publication of the results, there is an urgent need for a further publication that details the incidence of postoperative complications and the effect on disease-free survival. A total of 169 patients with hepatic cancer were randomized between January 1990 and April 1996; of these, 80 were randomized before surgery and 89 were randomized after surgery. Patients in the surgery-first group received radiation (18 Gy in three divided doses) within one week of surgery.

Patients in the radiation-first group did not undergo surgery. We report the results of the trial in the subset of patients with hepatitis C-related HCC who were included in the primary report. This subset of patients was analysed separately for disease-free survival and overall survival. All surviving patients were then followed up for three years after the start of treatment to identify treatment failures. There was no difference in three-year disease-free survival between the two groups (28% in the surgery-first group and 31% in the radiation-first group). Three-year overall survival was not significantly different (44% in the surgery-first group and 36% in the radiation-
